

Talking Mental Health

Talking Mental Health uses a stigma-busting curriculum to confront myths that reinforce silence that often surrounds mental illness. We place priority on educating in upper elementary, middle and high school classrooms, youth ages 13–18. The program helps youth and their families learn how to recognize, talk about, and treat mental health challenges. The curriculum uses trained facilitators who have faced these illnesses. Talking Mental Health is the only program that goes into the classroom and speaks to youth directly about mental illness.

Four strategies are offered: 1) Classroom sessions in upper elementary, middle and high schools where students are educated about mental health/illness awareness and suicide prevention in three 45-minute sessions by trained community facilitators in partnership with local schools. The curriculum shares personal stories, information on illnesses, discussion, resources, and interactive exercises. 2) "Train the Facilitator" workshops train adults and youth to facilitate the curriculum. 3) Teen Mentorship program where teens are trained to present the Talking Mental Health curriculum to their peers in school classrooms; 4) Professional Development and Community Forums for parents, school and community leaders, and individuals who are interested in learning more about the signs, effects, and treatment of mental illness. Forums include our Talking Mental Health curriculum, personal stories, and a question and answer session.
